Currently, youth athletes are evaluated based on the sound of their heart, blood pressure, and a review of the individual's medical history. While these tests can help determine some medical conditions, many doctors agree that an electrocardiogram (EKG) should be added to the test to accurately determine the athlete's health. It was determined that introducing an EKG test as a preventable measure could detect two thirds of "deadly, concealed heart trouble aggravated by exercise in competition," - National Athletic Trainers' Association.
